PORT BRIEFING

Local Customs

Dundakans observe a tradition known as The Empty Chair. At public gatherings, one seat is deliberately left vacant in remembrance of those who disappeared during the political upheaval that established the current government. Officials discourage the practice, but it remains widespread, particularly in rural communities.

Starport Advisory

All arriving passengers must declare personal computers and portable data storage devices. Customs officials may request access to stored information under the planetary Information Security Act.

Visitors are also advised that possession of political publications originating offworld may result in questioning or confiscation.

Government Denies Reports of Coastal Relocation Programme

The Ministry of Territorial Administration has dismissed reports that several coastal communities are being forcibly relocated to make way for new agricultural developments.

Independent observers report that communications with three affected settlements have been interrupted for more than two weeks.

Traveller's Notes

Dundaka's coastal markets are famous for their brightly coloured woven textiles, traditionally dyed using pigments extracted from native marine organisms. Particular patterns identify the region and sometimes the family of the weaver.

Visitors may notice that Dundakans often refer to government officials simply as Guests, a reference to the original occupation authorities. The term is usually spoken without apparent irony, although its meaning depends considerably on the company.
